Wrist actigraphy is a new type of method for non-invasive sleep monitoring. The aim of the present study was to investigate the reliability of wrist actigraphy data in relation to objective measures of sleepiness. The methodology involved three sets of actigraphy recordings: one basal test, two moderate mental challenge tests, and two high mental challenge tests. The basal and mental challenge tests (A and B) were run on two days at seven a.m. while the post-mental challenge tests (C and D) were run on two days at 12 p.m. There was a clear objective increase in sleepiness/fatigue and temperature associated with mental challenge tests B and D as compared to baseline and to test A. Likewise, there were clear objective increases in sleepiness/fatigue and temperature associated with post-mental challenge test C compared to test A. All subjective measures correlated significantly with objective measures. The present study has demonstrated that wrist actigraphy is a reliable method for measuring sleepiness, fatigue and temperature.Q: JSON to parse how to parse this JSON : { "registration_ids": [""], "result": { "status": "ok", "message": "Registered device token" }, "user_info": { "accepted_terms_of_service": true, "auto_renewal": true, "expires": 1576004800, "gender": "male", "device_identifier": "com.company.appname", "email": "email@gmail.com", "first_name": "Junaid", "last_name": "Haque", "phone
